Keeping parts of health law

BY HOLLY RAMER
Associated Press

CONCORD — Republicans competing for a chance to take on U.S. Sen. Jeanne Shaheen all want to repeal the federal health care overhaul law, though some would keep elements of it in place.

Responding to questions from The Associated Press, former state Sen. Jim Rubens and former U.S. Sens. Bob Smith and Scott Brown describe similar objections to the law that Shaheen, a Democrat, supports.

"It's not working the way we were promised," Brown said. "Rates are going up, people have lost insurance policies they were told they could keep, and there's no choice in the marketplace."

In addition to those points, Rubens also said the law is driving up the federal debt and deficit spending and called it "the largest expansion of big government in decades." Smith and Brown both argue that employer mandate provisions will hurt the economy.

"It will force employers to lay people off and/or cut back their hours, depending upon the number of employees in their business," Smith said.

Asked whether anything in the law should remain in place, Smith cited provisions that allow people to change jobs or insurers without danger of losing access to coverage and prohibit insurers from denying coverage to those with pre-existing medical conditions. Rubens, meanwhile, favors keeping the provision that allows children to stay on their parents' policies through age 26.

"It does not cost taxpayers, and is not a mandate," he said.

Brown, however, said none of the federal law should remain in place and that there is nothing Congress should do to provide greater access to affordable health insurance. Instead, states are best equipped to tackle that problem, he said.

Rubens said Congress should create catastrophic insurance pools to handle pre-existing conditions, with premium help for low-income individuals. He also has outlined a 15-point plan to reduce health care costs and improve quality that calls for means testing for Medicare and Social Security recipients, creating more community health clinics and allowing an interstate market for health insurance.

Smith agreed that insurance should be sold across state lines, and said tort reform could bring down cost. Other than that, Congress should "get out of the insurance market" and let the free market bring down costs through competition, he said.

More than 40,000 New Hampshire residents have signed up for health plans through the new insurance markets created by the law, including some of the 22,000 people who were told last fall that their previous policies would be canceled because they didn't comply with the law's provisions. The cancellations contradicted President Barack Obama's promise that those who liked their insurance could keep it, though New Hampshire residents had a chance to renew those plans through 2014, and about half had a chance to extend them an additional year.

Only one company sold health plans through the new marketplace during the first enrollment period. Next year, however, five companies are expected to offer plans, and each hospital will be included in at least three networks.

"We are very thrilled, and we hope the same thing is going to be true for all the others (journalists held)," said Padnos, speaking in a telephone interview from a boat outside Paris.

Curtis' release appeared to have been aided by the oil-rich nation of Qatar, which said Sunday that it had "exerted relentless efforts" to win the American's freedom. Qatar is a leading supporter of the Syrian rebels fighting to oust President Bashar Assad and has been involved in mediating past hostage releases.

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry said Curtis had been held by Jabhat al-Nusra, also known as the Nusra Front, an was met by U.S. government personnel who were transporting him to Tel Aviv. The official was not authorized to speak by name and discussed the release on the condition of anonymity.

The United Nations on Monday said it had been contacted by the United States and the Qataris on Saturday to facilitate a handover, and U.N. officials worked the phones overnight into Sunday.

Stephane Dujarric, spokeswoman for the U.N. secretary-general, told reporters that Curtis received a brief medical checkup with U.N. peacekeepers in the Golan Heights and "seemed fairly healthy" before he was handed over to

Maine ACLU: Drug testing plan is unconstitutional

AUGUSTA, Maine (AP) — The American Civil Liberties Union of Maine on Monday called on Republican Gov. Paul LePage's administration to halt plans to require some welfare recipients to receive drug tests, which it says is unconstitutional.

At a public hearing on the proposed rule change, Oamshri Amarasingham, the ACLU's public policy counsel, said the government must have a warrant based on probable cause to get a drug test except in limited circumstances.

"In addition to violating the constitution, the proposed rule represents unsound fiscal policy, leaves many critical questions unanswered and gives credence to harmful and false stereotypes."

LePage's administration recently announced that it will begin enforcing a 2011 law that allows the state to test recipients and applicants who've been convicted of drug-related felonies.

Other groups, like the Maine Association of Substance Abuse Programs, also opposed the plan on Monday.
